Girls of the Intercoastal Highway

The girls are nearly naked.

One has no suit on her behind and to make matters worse her friend is basting it with oil.

The girls are laughing in the sand.

It is a happy, decent laugh.

It is me that is at fault crouching behind my sunglasses.

The girls in Minnesota are whiter.

Or maybe these girls are Minnesotans, but from a part I don't know well like the Arrowhead region.

The girls wriggle on towels and laugh at the lotioned fingers.
When I return later from the hotel with my little boy's squirt gun

The girls are gone, doubtless shamed by my shame, slunk away to cover themselves. When I go home to my prairie state I shall miss the girls and their golden skin, back where the snow flies laterally and behinds sit in wooden chairs, lotionless, waiting for spring.

Poems I Meant to Write

I meant for the longest time to write about the little tasks, about tying the shoes, and fitting the stubby hands into gloves, I saw my big mitts negotiating the laces and slipping sleeve after sleeve over finger and thumb.

I should have saved the sand I dumped out of each sneaker, enough for a beach, enough for a castle and a moat.

I could have written about the look on their faces sometimes, that they saw us not as bristle sprouting oafs who yelled and grumped and reigned stupidly above eye level, but shining gods, omnipotent and perfect, strong heroes sent by a faraway star.

How when they cried in your arms they were praying to you to make it better, to lift the pain from their lives, and you could.

I could have written about the tiredness of the house, the exhaustion of the smeared tabletops, crusted with crud, sponged pointlessly after meals, the flakes and globs spattered on the floor that fill the cracks in the hardwood.

Or the handles on the stroller that were not long enough, so you walked in a crouch, and the white plastic wheels that turned sideways on a whim or a pebble and skidded to a halt.

I could have remembered their bodies between us in bed when they were babies, the smell of them there, the cramped caution of the dark, the wet exhalation from their noses.

I could have tallied every kick against the covers that woke you and annoyed you, then drew you even closer.

Why did they finally leave our bed, our big pink comforter and the warmth of the body familial, for starched white beds of their own?

There was space for us all, and another night would have cost them nothing, but they went.

I could have described the last night they woke up frightened and sauntered in barefoot and climbed in between us.

They slept again immediately, and we tried, too.

But I knew you were thinking, off on your side, that this was the curious moment, and this was our life, and these little fish cascaded from our sides, and the skinny white flanks of our children dove and fell beside us, in the soft light sliding out to sea.

What We Want

We want meat, but more than meat.

We want to know there will be meat next time we need meat.

We want beauty and allowance for not being beautiful.

We want to be naked, unashamed, beautiful, kind.

We want sun on our faces, and surprise, and the glint of recognition when we see and know the child in one another, and shamle out to play.

We want company and laughter and the drunken feeling of feeling, closing our eyes and feeling.

We want instructive journeys into our own hearts.

We want another chance to tell people what we meant.

We want to join hands with all those we have hurt and say we're sorry.

We want to stop being afraid of the dark, and afraid of the light.

We want to welcome the alien and celebrate the other.

We want to tell the secrets that have been choking us for years.

We want explanations, show us with arrows and diagrams why things happened, and how it is better.

We would like to be gods but will settle for angels, would settle for people better than us.

We want the feeling of winning just once but completely, the victory that heals the scars of a hundred beatings.

We want forgiveness for rude and forgetful crimes, the bullets we pump into each other, as if they were only words, the things we saw coming but couldn't bring ourselves to stop.

We want to die and be born and live, and die and be born again, moment to moment, feeling, flashing, rolling in sun.

We want to stop being bastards and bitches and locate the lost children locked away.

We want to sit at the knees of those we treasure and hear their stories into the night, applauding the best parts for all we are worth.

We want to see and taste and hear and feel and touch.

We want warmth, the calm of the sleeping body banked against us.

We want to kiss and kiss and kiss.

We want to say thank you a thousand thousand times.

More than meat we want light, to be known by the stars, by name, by face, by the secret token implanted in a hollow bone at birth, we want more, more, more, more --

We want to remember back before we could remember, have it all be there for us, recallable and clear.

We want to forget, sleep the sleep of the newborn rebuilding its energy in a swirl of slumber, empty eyes closed like peace, heated blood coursing like love.

Cannon Falls

The sidewalk is beautiful, one of those dry crystalline snows that sparkle in the moonlight like white sparking wires.

Too many rolls at supper club.
Then back to the bed and breakfast.
The bubble lights on the Xmas tree are boiling merrily.

Rachel reads on the sofa.
I sit in the library and pull book after book from the shelves.
Baseball, history, politics, poetry.

In one is a poem by Jon Silkin about the death of his child.

It is so heartbreaking I read it twice, and the sorrow saws right through me.

Suddenly I don't hate poetry.

It is not false or vain or unimportant, It is the best way to talk and think about things that matter most because in a hundred words or so I felt the stab of the boy's passing the crumpling of the parents, the sweetness and horror on one page, and I want more, I pulled a dozen books down from the shelves and careened crazily through them, greedy for more minds, more lives.

Every paragraph seemed to sing, every poem a shiver, people's pictures snapped in the moment of a lifetime, and I felt no envy only joy.

My chest hurt, I stepped outside and walked toward town.

The Zumbro River was frozen over, but I heard water by the bridge.

The falls are tumbling brown from the limestone table, like a greasy comb of water in winter. It is starting to snow again, and Rachel is there, and takes my arm, and we return like married people, coughing frost in the quiet air.

Tarantula and Wasp

You do not know the struggle, you cannot know the cost until you have been tangled with tarantula and wasp.

Tarantula is power, a fearsome hairy ghost.
It meets its wily match in the black bottomed wasp.

The spider fights for its life.
The insect wants its corpse as a furry incubator for a hundred eggs of wasp.

Live now or live later, a choice as old as Faust, enlivened by the anxious dance of tarantula and wasp.

Overdraft Notice

The blue wind that blows through the soul blows cold, it scatters leaves and opens envelopes with your name hovering in the cellulose window.
You know in an instant that the news will be painful.
You cry my god and fall to your knees.
Sometimes you go long weeks without opening them, sometimes you hide them under phonebooks, because if no one else sees them they maybe never came.

Other people's lives seem unhaunted, they write the amount of each check and subtract it from the balance, it is a wholly unsatisfactory way.
And yet they don't get these things all the time, whereas you don't go a year without one, and if you get one on a Monday chances are good you will get another Tuesday, and even if you go to them and thrust fistfuls of loose cash in their hands and pockets and say please, please take my money, and they look at you the way people look at an unclean child, You will still get another pair Thursday.

Each one costs $20 but you don't mind, you are glad the bank is getting something for its trouble and for putting up with you, you who were never meant to carry money around or write checks when something wonderful catches your eye.
These thin slips of paper with the blue circles on them that identify your sin and decide your punishment are your judges in this life.

You bow to their power and file them away in the shrine you have made for your pain.

They caught you again, they know who you are, they know what you've been doing.
